

November 28, 2008

On another Disney Blog, "The 2719 Hyperion Blog", run by Jeff Pepper, Jeff had posted in his blog that the blog and his Disney related activities were consuming an enormous amount of time and effort. Jeff noted that he was going to take time away from the blog and his Disney activities. In a comment left for Jeff, Ryan Crochet noted that he too had been in very same situation as Jeff and had "abandoned" the Club 71 Blog. Here is Ryan's comment.

Ryan Crochet said...

Thanks Jeff, that's really the biggest thing I can say to you. I have been trying for a very long time to find a way to put into words exactly what you have said in your post. It is that exact reasoning that led to my abandoning of the Club 71 Blog. I realized that I was, and had been so engrossed in all things Disney that it was actually beginning to take a toll on both my personal and professional life. Every minute of every day was spent surfing websites, scanning license plates (even at work), reading blogs, and ignoring everything and everyone else around me. It took a lot of long, hard thought and soul searching to come to terms with the idea that I had basically removed myself from the "real world" in favor of the escape that Disney could provide. Thank you for verbalizing what I've been thinking for a very long time, and best of luck to you in all your endeavors.

11/28/2008 11:28 PM