Javier, photgrapher

Havana is a beautiful and seductive city. Everyday life in its streetsand avenues is intense and reflects the Cuban idiosyncrasy of "turning a nice face to bad weather". It is evident in them at first sight the multi-racial character of that society and the demographic importance of the black and mulatto population. It carries at the same time very different contrasts. It is often one finds next to apartment buildings and residential houses, living quarters known as "solares" and "rooming houses", where several families live in very precarious living conditions. And although the residents in some of them belong to all racial groups, blacks and mulattoes without a doubt constitute the great majority.

